Appreciative Engineers

For the past two years, approximately, we have sat in the assembly hall anticipating an enjoyable time in viewing a presentation by the Armour Tech Players, each time they present one of their well chosen productions. We have never been disappointed by the Players or their work (in fact, they have done marvelously well when one considers the handicaps under which they labor) but each time we leave the assembly hall after the play, as a result of the performance given by the audience we become more convinced that even an embryo engineer is probably as discourteous, boorish, uncultured, and unappreciative as any so-called civilized human being can be.

These are strong words, we realize, and more than likely do not apply to the majority of the Armour Tech student body. However, the fact that any considerable number of college students could show such discourtesy as was evinced last Friday morning and has been evinced before does not call for words of commendation.

It may be that the students, who are responsible for the disgraceful display, which certainly ought to create a good impression on any visitor to the assembly, do not know the meaning of the word courtesy and what an important part such a quality should play in a human character. For their enlightenment we suggest a work of Noah Webster, which they might consult with profit.

We wonder further, if the offenders realize why the work of the Players demands courteous attention and commendation? For their further enlightenment the following facts are given. The Armour Players have been organized by a group which is sincerely interested in the drama and believes that there should be, and is, a place in the make-up of an engineer for an appreciation of dramatic art. This same group has defrayed all their expenses in presenting the plays and put into each performance an enormous amount of time. When one considers these facts it is very difficult to understand the behavior of the wellknown Armour Tech audience

This harangue, of course, brings to mind the recent discussion concerning the place in an engineering college's curriculum of cultural sub-At times it appears that engineering students are not so very interested in subjects of that nature and yet it seems quite obvious that one of the requisites of a successful engineer should be a working knowledge of appreciation and common every-day courtesy.

Letter Box

To the Editor, Armour Tech News: college education (Armour brand) intended only to give a man the necessary knowledge to design a floor beam or a machine screw? It seems to me, on the contrary, that four years of mental discipline, four voors which far more than teach specific matters, show how in-finitely many more are to be learned, should, to at least a slight degree, develop a broad and tolerant mental at-

I saw the presentation by the Armour Dramatic club last Friday of "The Rising of the Moon," by Lady Gregory. As a sincere effort to pro-duce sympathetically and artistically what is universally recognized by those who have the right to do so, as a modern classic, the work of the players was excellent, and might very well, but for their classmates, have indicated in Armour the presence of the spirit of true scholarship. But the attitude of apparently a majority of the student body toward the whole affair showed quite the contrary.

The discourtesy, the intolerance, and the downright ignorance shown by the Armour students on that occasion was discouraging to say the

Boasting of its desire to serve the Middle West by producing highly trained and efficient engineers, Armour is well known to have one of the most rigorous curricula in the United States. But its students appear to have a mental attitude toward everything but hard neaded, brass tacked money-making, so narrow, low, and unappreciative as to be absolutely witless
