There is a new consciousness within us of our relationship to that of the structure in which we live. The human being and architecture are related in a very intimate way; out of our need for more personal freedom from household drudgery have come splendid technological discoveries that have made it possible to fulfill all our daily needs with a minimum of effort on our part. We are of the world, a part of the soil and the trees and sky, no need to hide ourselves in a cave away from the beauty of the out doors. Because we have glass and steel we can protect ourselves from rain and heat and still have the look of nature around us. If we wish we can build our house amond the tree tops and enjoy a new sensation of space all about us. We direct architecture to our needs and desires. It does not direct us.
