It is impossible to separate the design of the outside from the inside of the house. One depends directly upon the other; they are an unit and must be planned as such. Designing the interior of a home is simply finding the elements that best suit it's form of architecture and direction fo design. Simple clean-lined pieces built for a definite use without useless ornamentation create a greater feeling of harmony within a room and have a more enduring quality of beauty. Texture in fabrics and rugs can add great richness without destroying the fine simplicity of a well designed room. Color used sparingly becomes more compelling than when used in too large areas.

A CERTIFICATION OF THE SECTION OF TH

INTERIOR DESIGN