

field it was forced to fill, Volume VIII of The Fulcrum was a success, tho it was realized by the staff that a sophomore class could not well represent the whole college on a paper. This year was indeed an '07 year at Armour.

As Juniors

When the registration was taken on September 18, 1905, the number of '07 men had dropped to about one hundred and ten. At the election of officers, Henning was chosen president. After numerous lesser activities in the fall, we came to our junior dance, again at the Colonial Club, but on February 2, 1906. This dance was one of the most enjoyable Armour parties of the year. In the inter-class track meet '07 was fourth, but in base ball it was first and foremost. With E. W. Jones' second year as manager, the '07 team defeated all the class teams. Now we come to a point in our history which must ever show the initiative, the perseverance, and the industry which go to make up the "spirit of the Class of 1907." That point is Junior Week. '07 gave to Armour its first Junior Week, conceived, arranged, and carried out thru a willing and harmonious co-operation of all the members of the class. From May 21 to 25, 1906, the notable events of this week took place. Monday morning, an institute assembly with a musical program opened the week. Tuesday night—on Ogden Field, before the largest audience ever assembled there—"Math Cremation," in which more than half of the junior class took part. Wednesday night, May 23rd,—the junior class banquet with about one hundred plates spread at the Union. This with its good cheer, its stories and frolic, lasted till morning. Thursday, the junior book, The Integral, was to appear, but was unavoidably held back by a compositors' strike at the printers. Friday evening—a glee and mandolin club concert in the Mission, followed by a second junior informal dance, this time in the gymnasium. Altogether a great week and a good tradition started. The men in charge of Junior Week were H. R. Badger, C. S. Henning, Jr., E. H. Ellett, Jr., C. U. Smith, E. W. Jones, H. W. Jones, and A. A. Kelkenney. Shortly after the close of this week, the Integral came from the printers and was a creditable "Book of the Class of 1907." H. R. Badger and A. A. Kelkenney were editor-in-chief and business manager, respectively, and with Stagg, L. B. Jones, and Gilmore made up the Board.
