

The annual theater party, held by the Rooter's Association, occurred on Friday night, December the 12th. A large reservation was made, by the Rooter's board, at the American Music Hall. The play for that evening was, "The Ham Tree," in which the famous comedians, MacIntyre and Heath, played the principal parts. It was very easy to be seen that the central section of the main floor was alive and awake so as to catch all that came their way. This was especially shown when Heath made a shot at the Civil Engineers in reference to "being good doughnut shovelers."

A great many of the students are thinking of taking a course in agriculture so that they may grow ham and egg trees. The egg tree idea appealed more to the freshmen. The freshmen seemed to devote most of their time and energy to clapping at inopportune times. The question remains as to whether they were trying to queer the show or just didn't know any better. Any way they wound up the performance with nine rahs for the chorus. The crowd then adjourned to the Mandarin Inn and "partook of a slight repast."
