Little "Pewee" was the regular jack-in-the-box among the seniors. The supposedly more learned seniors were always jumping him but he shed them off like a duck does water. Though small in body he was a giant in heart and mind and to those who knew him his good will was predominant. His glad hand and that catching smile, developed probably thru his vamping efforts in the play, were the secrets of his popularity, with the women and men respectively. He shows us clearly that all great men are not six feet tall.

Al was the kind of a fellow who was in no one's way but always ready to give his assistance. He had the Chicago "I Will" spirit all the way thru school and that along with his individuality makes him of a most manly character. His accomplishments on the mandolin always furnished a snappy bit of music, especially the kind that is sought for now. His pastime at cards made him a good dealer, especially to himself, but his good nature and wit always kept him out of any difficulties. It is also noteworthy to mention that he never purposely overlooked any fair damsels who perchance passed his way.
