

Our Saturday afternoons and Sundays were spent in wood-chopping, hiking, rowing, and swimming. Frequent visits were made to Minocqua where the small town life could be enjoyed. This town was visited by the students in a body on Independence Day. The patriotic celebration which was held was headed by a parade of Indians and ex-service men. In the latter group, Camp Armour was well represented. The parade was followed by various races, an Indian dance, and a baseball game. In the evening a public dance was held, at which, Camp Armour was again well represented.

Upon another Saturday, a game of baseball was played by Camp Armour and Camp Sprague. In this game the Armour nine proved victorious, the score being 8 to 5.

The monotony of camp life was at times broken by severe storms. During one of these storms, one tent was blown down, two others ripped by the wind, and general havoc was raised. This however, was not disastrous and the camp went on as usual on the following day.

Monotony was broken also, by the arrival of letters and packages from "Chi." We would advise all future campers to cultivate the acquaintance of a few good cake and candy makers before leaving home.

It was with much regret that, on July 16th, we packed our trunks, took down the tents and took our last swim in Trout Lake. We were now ready for our trip back to the big city. We had done our work under the conditions which we would have to face as engineers. It was but an introduction to our life's work. Upon this introduction our career is, in a way based, for, to be successful in the initiation leaves more than hope for success in the future.

The following were the members of the Armour Summer Camp of 1920:

Appelbaum	Hayden	Lowden
Barrett	Holmes	Nelle
Burke	Hyde	Neimann
Carr	Holtquist	Rotberg
Cunningham	Johnson, H. W.	Smith
Davis	Kauders	Van Dyke
Frink	Krebs	Walk
Fisher	Levin	Walker
Goedhart	Lemm	White
Hess	Mayo	