

ATHLETICS

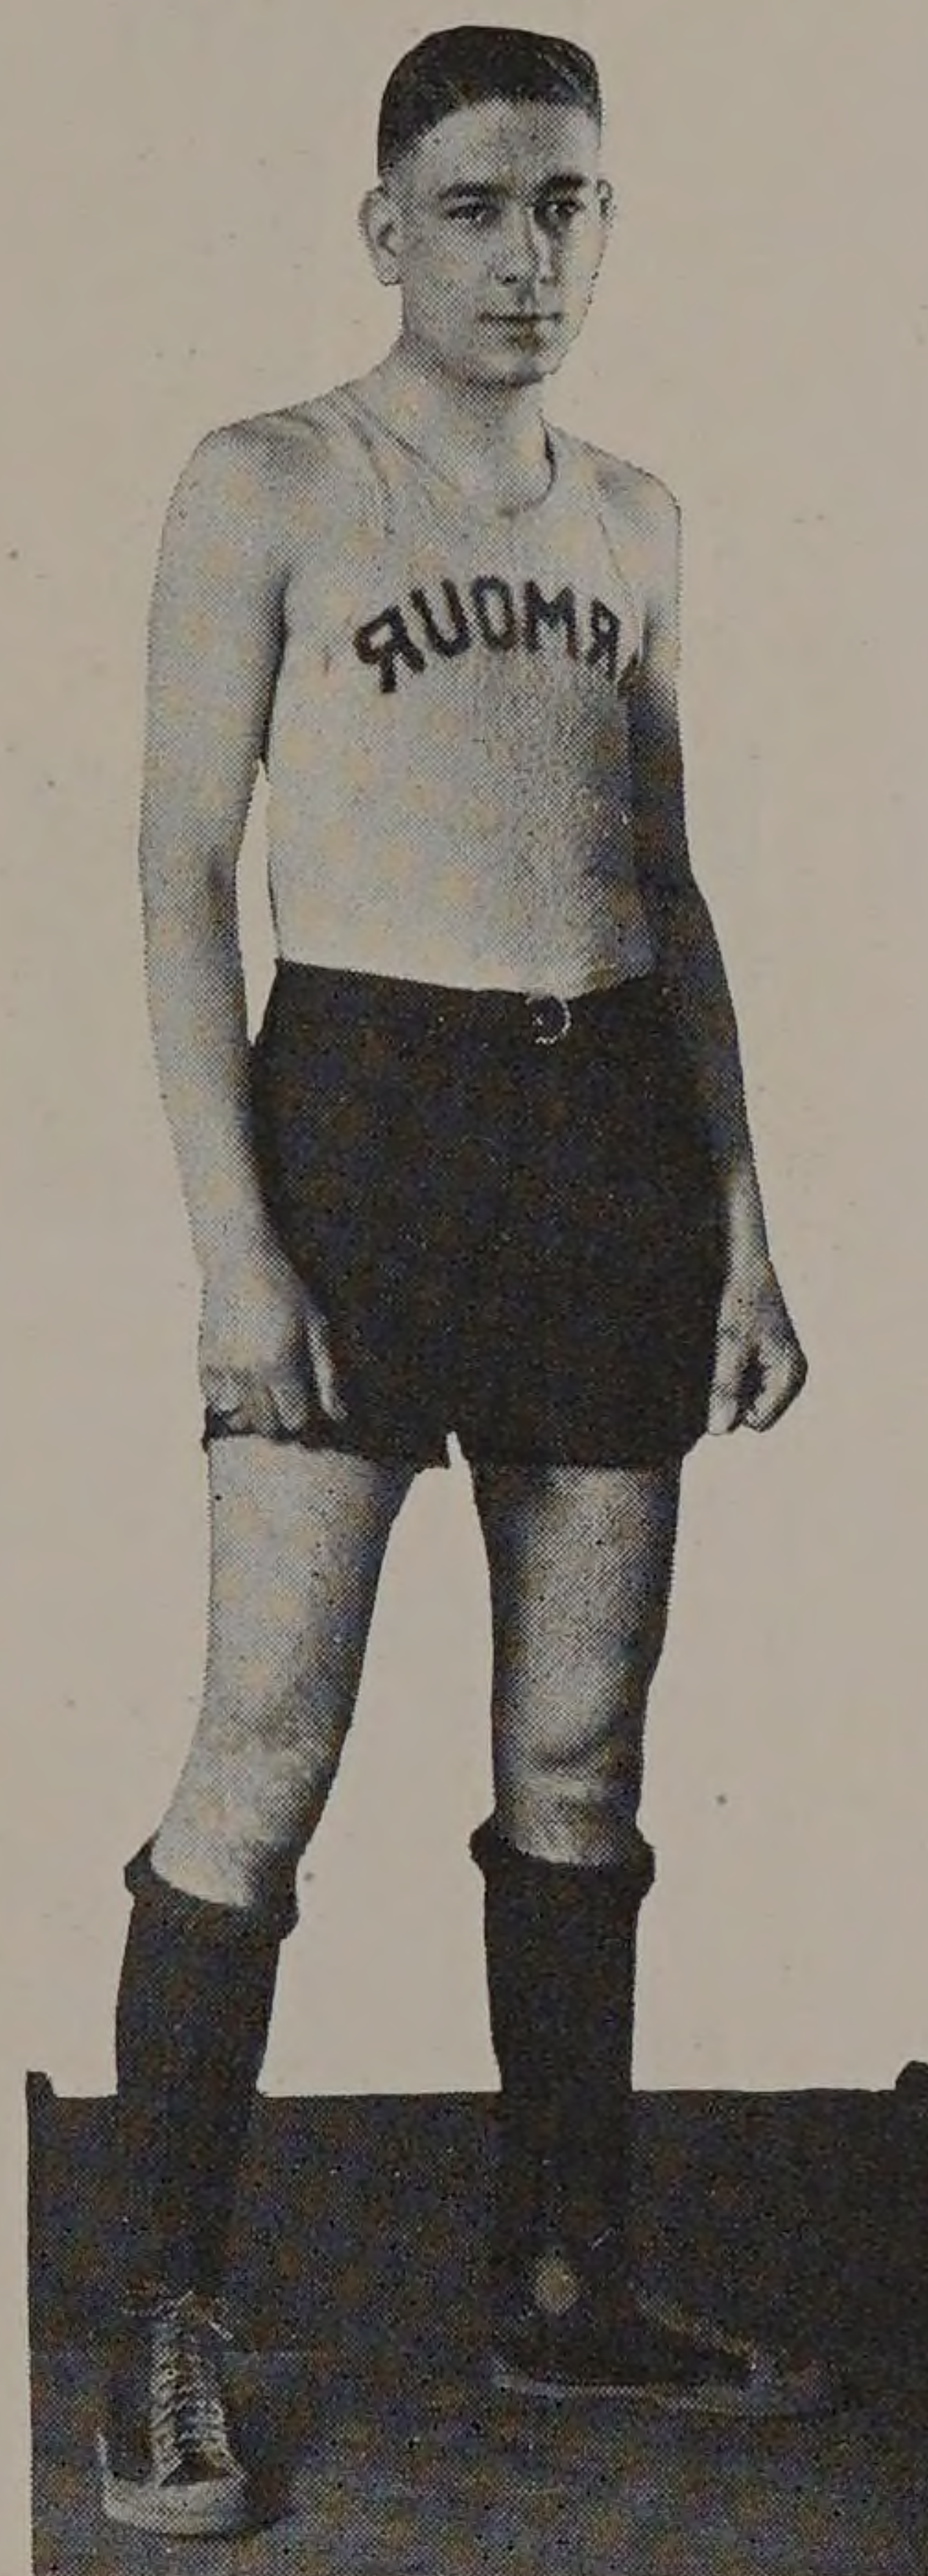

CAPTAIN McLAREN,
1922-23

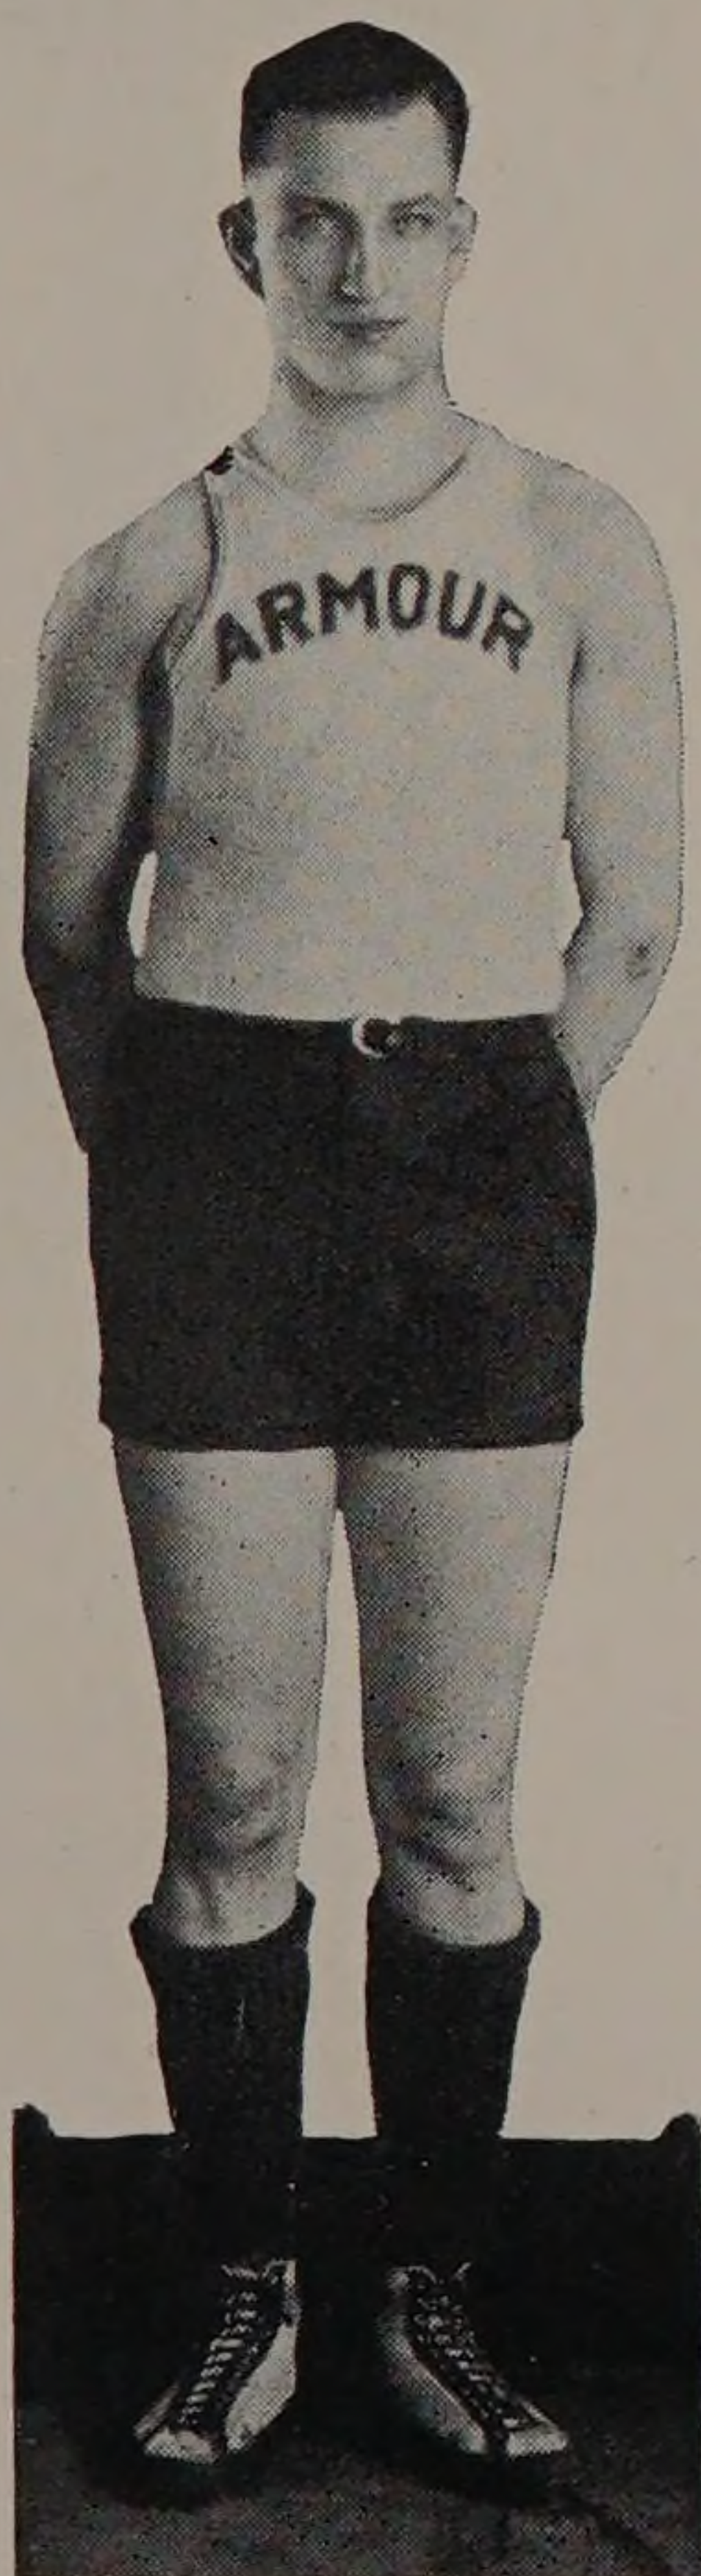

McLaren playing his first year of basketball for Armour, proved to be one of the bright lights of the team. Although an unknown quantity at the first of the season, his rapid development enabled him to win a regular berth at running guard, from which he was shifted to forward in mid-season. The most consistent player on the team, he could always be relied upon to play his best at all times. Injuries for a large part of the season prevented him from making a better showing.

McLaren's leadership and next year's prospects have the appearance of a greater basketball season for Armour in 1922-23.

Gerhardt Schumacher (familiarily known as Gerry) won his third letter in basketball this year. Gerry proved to be high point man for his second consecutive year. He has the qualities usually found in a finished basketball forward. He was the best dribbler on the squad, and this combined with his uncanny eye for the basket, made him a man to be feared at all times by opponents. His basket shooting in the Detroit University game will long be remembered by the Detroit fans. Whenever a point was necessary, via the free throw route, Gerry could invariably be relied upon.

SCHUMACHER

MAY

Max May, playing his second year of basketball for Armour, was a tower of strength at guard. He was the fullback of the basket team, and many are his opponents who will always bear this in mind. For a man of his size he handled himself remarkably well on the floor. He will always be remembered for his aggressiveness and never-die spirit. Fair in the art of basket shooting, he stood above par as a guard.
