THE CYCLE

The affiliation between The Armour Institute of Technology and Northwestern University removes many obstacles from the path of progress of the Institute, but it also brings into existence a number of minor problems. One of these is the future of the publications at Armour, a problem that is of special interest to all of those men who have worked on THE CYCLE or THE ARMOUR ENGINEER. Since most the colleges of the large universities publish technical magazines, it is very probable that THE ARMOUR ENGINEER will continue as the technical publication of The Armour College of Engineering and Architecture of Northwestern University. The case of Armour's year book, however, is different, and it is inevitable that with the final merging of the two institutions THE CYCLE will fade into the past. It is only natural that we of the present CYCLE Staff, with all of our predecessors, should regret the passing of THE CYCLE, yet we realize that such is the price of progress and we hope that our successors will make the few closing volumes of THE CYCLE the finest that human effort can produce.
