

THE CLASS OF 1933

The class of '33 now stands midway in its collegiate career. Like Janus, the Roman god, having two faces, the class has now the right and the opportunity to look both ways. It has left behind the trials and tribulations of the first two years; it is facing the privileges of upper classmen.

E. E. Sademan

Now that the first two years of a collegiate career have passed, some intangible advantages may be recounted. These two years have permitted the members of the Class of '33 to learn to work together and to grow into the spirit and traditions of Armour Institute. Strangers have become friends and classmates. A spirit of cooperation has been developed. At times, this spirit has reached such a high degree as to cause strenuous objections from the professors. Greater ability to analyze each problem that arises has come to each member of the class. With these added advantages, the class of '33 presses forward to the work of the next two years during which time these friendships will be further strengthened and a deeper feeling of loyalty to Armour will continue to flourish and grow.

As freshmen, the members of the class became acquainted with the routine of college life. As the newness and strangeness of this life wore Seafuri, Cislak, Alexander, Dumser, Demikis, Jeffery, Oberbeck, Thomson, Alexander, McWilliams, Berglund, Kenner, Davidson, Gidvan, Goo.

Hoffman, Chandler, Rupprecht, Lewis, Job, Leonard, Wilson, Moravec, Buehne, Snelling, Galvani, Fishman, Bestles, Winegar, Reber.
Johnson, Anderson, Snapp, Staib, Bodinson, Hulsivit, Weldon, Curran, Kaiser, Priban, Marks, Golden, Cohan, Ream, Rowe.