believed, however, that the class was now at its lowest level. It was necessary for all to cooperate in the Rush if the class was to win, because the class was to meet a group that was vastly superior in number.

Amid much wrangling and confusion the class election was held in October. For the first time members of the class were exposed to coalitions and actual political scheming. Not only were fusion candidates supported and petitioned by fraternity men in the primary election, but inter-departmental candidates were also entered in the primary. Members of the various departments were encouraged to pledge their support for candidates from the department. All felt the influx of undergraduate politicians who worked earnestly for their friends in an effort to place them in office. The primary election although well contested and exciting held little of the furor that accompanied the general election. All candidates were the subject of hotly contested arguments both in and out of the various classrooms. After the election returns were announced the quarrels and the heated controversies that had surrounded the election subsided and the class willingly returned to its unified position.

Not only did Sophomores aid the basketball team, but a number of the members of the class performed splendidly on the track team while others were out-
