the class was disappointed when it was announced that Junior Week would be shortened. Nevertheless the Sophomores made complete preparations for it. Awaiting Open House to inaugurate the week, the class was interested in the forthcoming field day stunts and activities. The class anxiously awaited this chance to enter into the various events and activities. Fraternity members of the class prepared for both the interfraternity sing contest and the interfraternity stunt. Practising for the interfraternity relays in addition to the interclass relays, they gave every intention of competing full heartedly in their assigned events. The class hoped that they would be able to place a winning team in the baseball playoffs that would be held in the midst of the activities. Most patiently awaited of all of the activities was the Rush. Always a riotous scene it gave promise of being even more violent than ever before; it was certain that roughness would predominate. Plans were completed, and the class felt confident of victory by virtue of their experience and the tact they planned to use. The entire class announced its intention of entering the event, so there was little doubt that the class would be without loyal supporters. Such cooperation proved to the upper-class men the unity which had been attained through pleasant association during the past two years.

As the year draws to a close all Sophomores realize that they have indeed passed through a long and strenuous year. The Sophomore year is proclaimed by upper classmen to be the hardest year at Armour. Few of the present class will doubt this statement. A glance at the depleted ranks of the class that began two years ago as a group of students nearly three hundred and forty men strong, will aid in proving the statement. As difficult as the course has been, there is every indication that the group that now remains will graduate together only two years from now. Segregation into departments will divide the class even more than it did this year, but even though inter-department rivalry will become intense there is little doubt that the class will not always respond to fight for '40 whenever the cry is heard. The associations that have been formed these past two years will not be broken by specialization into departments. The hardest years at Armour have been spent together. There is no need to fear that the class will not continue as a unified body, even though it will be broken into smaller and more compact groups. It is the hope of the entire class that the segregation into small groups will knit the class even closer together through a union of departmental classes. The summer vacation will separate the class temporarily, but having made two downs on this game toward victory there is every indication that the remaining two downs will be obtained with less difficulty.
