Honor "A" Society was established at Armour Institute of Technology through the efforts of C. C. Heritage, a former student of the University of Chicago. The organization that was suggested to officials of the Institute by Heritage, familiar with a similar honor athletic society at the University of Chicago, received the immediate approval by officers of this school, who authorized the issuance of a charter for the proposed organization in the fall of 1914. Founded to honor lettermen and to stimulate athletic endeavor at the Institute, the society gained immediate support from members of the athletic teams. During the first year of existence, charter membership was extended to sixteen members of Armour athletic teams by the society.

Originally the organization served as a governing body which presided over all campus athletics.

In this capacity Honor "A" sponsored and encouraged athletic competition between classes, engineering societies, and fraternities, and it officiated at intramural contests and campus activities. Funds collected by the Institute in payment of the student activity fee were entrusted to Honor "A," which apportioned the money among Armour athletic teams, musical organizations, and publications. In 1922 Honor "A" relinquished its governing activities to the newly formed Armour Tech Athletic Association, now the Armour Tech Student Association, the organization that has since administered those financial activities. Since this change in the program of the society, Honor "A" has devoted full attention to lettermen of Armour continuing only in the capacity of a council of suggestion on athletic affairs to the Armour Tech Student Association.
