SENIOR DANCE

The seniors of Armour had spent three years keeping their long legs carefully guarded at previous dances for fear that one sweeping swing might jar the floor or break the walls from their supports. It was with this thought in mind that the seniors carefully selected as the site of their dance, the Cedar Room of the Oriental Building.

Besides spaciousness, the ballroom floor of carefully selected oak furnished a very satisfactory base upon which the seniors and their guests, their extremely attractive guests, were to build an enjoyable evening. Thus every requirement for extensive dancing was fulfilled and the seniors certainly took advantage of the situation. An attempt was made to hold the largest Big Apple dance in the history of Armour's social year, but the structural members of the building were not sufficiently strong enough to continue the strenuous dance.

Overlooking the dance floor, a spacious balcony served the resting couples as a vantage point from which to enjoy watching others dance. The seniors were fortunate in obtaining the services of "Johnny Mullaney and his Band". The boys of the band proved themselves not only able musicians, but clever entertainers as well.

Another added feature of the Senior Swing was the presentation of a unique program, which will be kept as a fond souvenir of an enjoyable and danceable evening.
