"The Armour Faculty Club" is indeed all that the name might imply. Being an enticing rendezvous for short periods of relaxation, it serves as a convenient meeting place for its members; it is an "oasis" amid the pressing duties that surround all members of the faculty.

The rooms of the Faculty Club form the gay spot at Armour. Recreational facilities are offered in especially furnished chambers which are always filled with jostling but jovial members of the faculty. The spirit of friendly rivalry is always in evidence around the game tables. So absorbed do members become while engaged in playing games that they often forget their class schedules and treat students to unannounced vacations. While some are intent upon winning contract bridge games, other members are showing their skill at billiards. Amid the "able" coaching offered by interested spectators, billiard enthusiasts spend many hours practicing and competing with fellow members. The veteran coach, R. V. P., assists in explaining just how a play should be executed, but occasionally a novice will disregard all advice and play as he believes. Then the ivories are in danger of leaving the field of action to continue their travel upon the floor.

Not content to remain in their own, prescribed location the club members go forth to seek additional entertainment. At least once a year they invade the Faculty Ladies' Club. There they forget the card games and billiards, and the reading and discussion of their own domain, and pose as Beau Brummels to the awe stricken ladies. Again they may stage a stag party such as is held annually in November. There, after participating in a "turkey dinner and in song," the members revel to the stirring tunes of popular song hits, proving that faculty members are just as light hearted as the students who fill the classrooms at Armour.
