

JUNE 8, 1939 . . . A date that will linger with the Class of 1939 for years to come. It was on that day that one hundred and fifty sons of Armour reached a long anticipated finale of four years of study. The forty-third annual commencement was held at the Museum of Science and Industry in Jackson Park, Chicago. This famous building has been one of Chicago's most beautiful examples of fine architecture since the Exposition of 1893, and because it now represents the progressive spirit of modern industry and science, it was deemed proper that the senior class should hold its commencement exercises there.

Graduation day has often been looked upon as a day of parting for old classmates and pals, but we, as engineers, may consider it as merely a transition point which we may jump over together. Engineering is a profession which unifies the men who participate in its development.
