Since the inauguration of the Golden Gloves tournament in Chicago some years ago, Armour has always had a team entered, and this year was no exception. Conceded by most everyone to be one of the toughest tournaments in the country, the boys from Thoidy-thoid and the tracks have always made a presentable showing. Five Armourites saw action in this classic this year. DeGeorgi, who fought at White City, made the best showing by winning three bouts before he stopped a fast one. Colant advanced to the quarter finals, only to lose out on a very close decision. Incidentally, he's the lad that will do the captaining in the season to come. Peterson, Kotulla, and Erickson, fighting in the Loyola Section, were defeated in their first bouts. Sonny Weissman, broker of the Armour sock market, also has had no little experience in the Golden Gloves. However, Sonny's connections with the Gloves have been a little less hazardous and at the same time more remunerative than those of the boxers. He's seen quite some service as a sectional referee. Lack of meets was a sore spot with the squad, and in their only scheduled meet of the season the boxers took quite a beating at the hands of Culver. Cappodano was the only Techman to come through with a win, although Colant, Erickson, and Barnabee all lost by only one point.
