One of the newer additions to the societies at the Institute is the Armour Eye, founded at Armour Institute of Technology on December 16, 1936. The club was organized by a number of students whose common interests and abilities in photography led them to form a closely knit organization with well defined purposes. By banding together in this manner each member was enabled to obtain the benefits of fine equipment and facilities which normally would be beyond his means as an individual. At present the club has two dark rooms, a studio, a meeting room, and a committee room. The equipment in the dark rooms enables members to produce photographs by almost any of the processes known to modern photography. The studio equipment further allows the performance of general photographic work through its several cameras and studio lights. Ample opportunity is given for the exchange of views and ideas at the monthly meetings of the club, when lectures and demonstrations are presented by members and by men prominent in the professional field.
