This May marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of Scarab, professional architectural fraternity, at Armour. Scarab fraternity was founded at the University of Illinois in 1909. In 1915 a society at Armour which had been functioning since shortly after the turn of the century as Alpha Theta Delta, an honorary limited to students of architecture of the Institute, petitioned for membership in Scarab fraternity. The petition was received favorably and shortly afterwards Edfou temple of Scarab was established at Armour. Edfou had become the third Temple in a fast growing national professional fraternity, which at the present time numbers thirteen Temples at the leading schools of architecture in the country. Scholarship, future probability of success in the profession, and personality are requirements for membership. The fraternity was founded that in the vast desert of life these Temples of Scarab would serve at the various institutions of learning to provide a broader knowledge of architecture, to promote friendly competition between students and schools of architecture, and to develop those qualities of culture and principles of conduct which are essential to the ethical practice of the profession of architecture.
