Honor "A," the society to which all athletes are eligible but to which few are elected . . . this may briefly describe Armour's athletic honorary. This discriminating selection is one factor which gives Armour's athletes an added incentive to be more than good athletes and major letter winners. For to be truly eligible for Honor "A," the candidate must be considered by active members of the organization to have personality, outstanding character, and to have co-operated in and contributed to the success of his team. This organization, founded in 1914, has honored three hundred athletes in the twenty-six years of its existence. Primary functions of Honor "A" are to encourage students to go out for the teams and to promote the general welfare of athletics whenever possible. It gives an award to the outstanding freshman athlete each year as a spur to future effort and success. Other activities include the sponsorship of an annual Honor "A" alumni banquet, to which last year seventy-two athletes, dating back to the class of '14, were present.
